Passes Away at Old Tennessee Home After Life of 95 Years.

The death in Knoxville, Tenn., of Elizabeth O'Brien Brownlow at the age of 95 was noted briefly by newspapers which printed columns almost daily fifty years ago about the words and deeds of her husband, William Gannaway Brownlow, the Fighting Parson, whose championship of the Union and whose flaming denunciation of secession were so valuable to his country in the border States.

Mrs. Brownlow survived her intrepid Mrs. Brownlow survived her intrepld husband for thirty-seven years. Not merely as the widow of one of the great figures of American history but also because of her own brave and unselfish career she was greatly honored as she neared the end of her days. In the old Brownlow home, where the Fighting Parson had written his fearless editorials for the Whig and from which he had gone out many times to be shot at and asout many times to be shot at and as-suitted, she received six Presidents of the United States—Johnson, Grant, Hayes, McKinley, Roosevelt and Taft In her younger days she had courtesied to Andrew Jackson and Gen. Sam Hous-ton. Her active life covered eighty years ### of the eventful history of her country. Of Distinguished Ancestry.

Mrs. Brownlow, born in Kingsport, Tenn., September 25, 1819, came of distinnished ancestry. Her father was William nith O'Brien, who figured prominently in the revolt in Ireland in 1848. She was closely related to Major-Gen. Edmund Pendleton Gaines, a hero of the Revolutionary war: to Judge Nathaniel Pendleton, Alexander Hamilton's second in the fatal duel with Aaron Burr; to President James K. Cachary Taylor, to President James K olk and to many other soldlers and law-akers of the early part of the nineteenth met Parson Brownlow when he was She met l'arson browniow shen he act a Methodist circuit rider, and although her parents objected to the penniless and prospectless preacher their courtship pro-gressed and they were married in 1836. Shortly after that William Gannaway Brownlow's voice began to carry far. When he was still a youthful exhorter great crowds flocked to his meetings, but the country began to know about him when he became the editor of the Knoxville Whig in 1838 and conducted it so aggressively as to get his name of "the aggressively as to get his name of "the Fighting Parson." For years, or until 1881, when the Con federate authorities suppressed the paper, Brownlow thundered against disloyalty. He was not opposed to slavery, but he detested the secession advocates. His temper was flery and he came to blows many times with secession sympathizers, who tried to scare him out of Tennessee sion of the print sale in the Anderson galleries yesterday. It was the large "Burgos prisoned. Sometimes he was hunted through the mountains. But he could not be silenced and the Government at Washington had cause to thank Parson Brown-low for his splendid championship of the
